

Simple, Preventive Plumbing Fix for Major Remodels

A couple of years ago, we formed a group of like-minded large scale remodeling companies to meet monthly to share our trials and tribulations to learn from each other.

During a recent meeting, the discussion came to plumbing problems. In particular, after large scale projects where the clients moved out for a significant time (more than a month or two). The conjecture from the group was that old debris in the pipes stayed soft with the constant use. Once the family moved out, the gunk had the opportunity to harden and then cause problems once the family resumed residence.

The group experience had been that there was often a problem with sewer back-ups after the clients had moved back into the house. Several of the members now routinely snake the drains prior to the clients moving back into the house. It seems like a good idea to implement.
